

Use of Tracking Devices by Investigators.

The use of tracking devices by investigators in the course of investigating disability claims has been debated by the Investigator members of DISPA. They have made the following statement: -

“DISPA recognises that the use of tracking devices is not illegal but believes the use of tracking devices can be disproportionate to the investigation of disability claims. DISPA takes the view that there is a risk to disability insurers of adverse publicity and damage to the insurer’s reputation if a firm of investigators working for the insurer was found to be using tracking devices to investigate disability claims particularly in circumstances that were not proportionate. DISPA recommends that disability insurers should only instruct firms of investigators that undertake never to use tracking devices in the investigation of disability claims, unless expressly requested in writing to do so by the insurer (and reinsurer where appropriate) and the firm of investigators is willing to use such equipment because the firm reasonably regards the use as proportionate.”
